Week 2: Last Look

When watching Randy Pauch's Last Lecture it really made me stop and think. At first, I thought it was going to be too long, but once I started, I didn't want the lecture to stop. The way that he spoke was so honest and positive, even though he was facing something really difficult.

What stood out to me the most was how he talked about obstacles. He said the "brick walls" in life aren't there to keep us out, but to test how much we really want something. That hit me because I've had times in my own life when things felt impossible, but pushing through those moments helped me grow stronger. I feel like I heard this lecture at the right time in my life. I'm going through many obstacles and I needed to hear these things he said.

I also admired how grateful he was for the people in his life. It made me realize that I need to focus more on the good things I have, instead of letting little problems take up so much of my energy.

Overall, the lecture inspired me to keep working hard for my goals, appreciate the people around me, and not take time for granted.
